Don Peck

Not all genius is concentrated in cities. Thomas Coke Rice, a Tennessee mountaineer, without training of any kind, is a skilful wood and metal artisan. He makes his own tools from raw ore which he procures near his home, and has with his own hands fashioned his forge and rotary blower. The very chair which his mother occupies is of his handiwork.

Another talent, but one of a vastly different order, is that possessed by Mrs. Anna Bell of Pasadena, California, whose success in the raising of dogs has netted her a fortune. From her farm have come many of the blue-blooded prize winners and champions of the country, and her "family" is a variegated one, consisting of Yorkshires, Pomeranians, French poodles and others.

An original "hobby" is the one practised by Mr. Max Williams. He makes miniature models of famous ships, and in his collection can be seen replicas of "Old Ironsides," so dear to the heart of every American; "Bonhomme Richard," the famous flagship of the daring John Paul Jones, and models of dreadnaughts and ships of a few hundred years ago.
